Brand guide v1.1

Witty, simple, editorial social software for people who would rather not.

social made tolerable.

Posterboy is a SaaS social media startup for business owners, operators, and grown-ups who know they need to show up online - but do not want social media to become their second job.

The founding story matters: built by Bradly so his mom would stop asking him to help with her social media. That makes the brand useful, charming, and disarmingly human. It should feel like a clever assistant, not another platform to babysit.

POSITIONING LINE

For people who hate social media, but use it for business.

PROMISE

Less posting panic. More done-for-you momentum.

Posterboy is designed for adults 30+ who have a real business, limited patience, and no desire to learn every trend, sound, hashtag, and algorithmic ritual.

THEY NEED

visibility, consistency, polish, confidence, proof of life online.

THEY HATE

blank calendars, performative content, app-switching, feeling behind.

THEY TRUST

plain language, tasteful
defaults, editorial judgment, done-for-you systems.

Audience shorthand: the owner who needs social media to work, not become a personality transplant.

the wordmark does the talking.

The posterboy logo is a lowercase editorial wordmark: refined, a little smug, and intentionally un-startupy. It should appear with restraint. Let the contrast and type carry the identity.

USAGE RULES

Use generous space around the wordmark. Keep it lowercase. Do not add icons, gradients, drop shadows, outlines, or social-media-ish badges. When in doubt, make it smaller and give it more air.

black, white, and one good pencil.

The palette should feel like an editorial page with a tiny bit of markup. Most layouts are black and paper. Accent

RATIO

70% paper/white, 25% ink/charcoal, 5% accent. Posterboy should never look like a rainbow dashboard.

editorial first. software second.

The brand typography pairs a high-contrast editorial serif with a clean, functional sans. The logo already brings personality, so the rest of the system should be calm and readable.

DISPLAY SERIF

Make posting less weird.

Use for headlines, hero statements, campaign lines, and brand moments. Direction: Canela, Editorial New, Domaine Display, or a refined Didot/Bodoni-style serif.

helpful with a raised eyebrow.

Posterboy sounds like the smart person in the room who can explain the internet without becoming unbearable. The voice is witty, concise, specific, and allergic to hustle-bro language.

SAY THIS

Your post is drafted. You may now return to society.

Three posts a week. No interpretive dances required.

We turned that rambling idea into a usable caption.

Approve it, ignore it, or pretend you never saw it.

NOT THIS

Crush your content goals with viral growth hacks.

Dominate the algorithm every single day.

AI-powered content optimization at scale.

Seamlessly streamline your social workflow.

what we keep saying.

SIMPLE

A social system that reduces decisions, not adds them.

TASTEFUL

Editorial polish without influencer cosplay.

USEFUL

Built for business outcomes: consistency, clarity, and leads.

HUMAN

A product with a reason to exist and a family origin story.

SAMPLE LINES

make the internet feel printed.

The design system should borrow from magazines, newspapers, notebooks, and marked-up proofs: roomy layouts, strong margins, sharp type, tasteful crops, small labels, and confident whitespace.

PHOTOGRAPHY

real business owners, desks, details, hands, receipts, calendars - not fake influencer sets.

LAYOUT

wide margins, one big idea per page, labels and footnotes as personality.

UI

calm, text-forward, no dopamine confetti. Make done feel elegant.

ILLUSTRATION

minimal markups, arrows, circles, paper textures, editorial annotations.

launch with restraint.

Use the brand like a smart editorial assistant: clear enough to trust, funny enough to remember, simple enough to ship.

- Use the lowercase wordmark on paper or ink.
- Lead with the problem: business owners hate posting, but need presence.
- Write like a person, not a SaaS landing page.
- Keep layouts quiet; let the words land.
- Use red pencil as an accent, not a theme.
- Make every feature feel like relief.
